GALLATIN, ALBERT, to JEFFERSON. Monticello.

1803, August 13, New York. Is not competent to judge whether the granting a passage in a United States frigate to Jerome Bonaparte may be considered a breach of neutrality by Great Britain. 1807, October 21. Objects to the general spirit of the message. To him it appears in the shape of a manifesto against Great Britain on the eve of a war, rather than what the present circumstances require. It might be construed into an eagerness to see matters brought to an issue by an appeal to arms. In his opinion, recommendations and incitements to war should not, under the Constitution, be made by the Executive. Should England refuse satisfaction for the Chesapeake outrage, we would be supported; but should we still declare war if she does justice, we would meet with formidable opposition.
